

QUESTION 18 OF 52: NOT ANSWERED

The main idea of the final paragraph is that human quirks make it difficult to predict people's ethical decisions accurately.

It identifies topics discussed in the final paragraph (human quirks and people's reaction to economic injustice) but not its main idea.

people universally react with disgust when faced with economic injustice.

It identifies topics discussed in the final paragraph (human quirks and people's reaction to economic injustice) but not its main idea.

understanding human psychology may help to define ethics in economics.

The author states that psychology can help "define ethics for us," which can help explain why people "react in disgust at economic injustice, or accept a moral law as universal."

economists themselves will be responsible for reforming the free market.

The final paragraph does not suggest that economists may be responsible for reforming the free market.
